When Earl Fain IV, better known to most who knew him as “Baron,” died suddenly on July 31 it was a loss to many. His lovely wife Courtenay and fine son Tradd lost a devoted husband and loving father, many – myself included – lost a close and trusted friend, a host of fraternal, historical, and social organizations lost an enthusiastic member and active participant, and the Ben Silver Corporation – and I don't write this lightly – lost a great talent who was able to take his interest in heraldry, vexillology, and history and combine it with a keen eye and creative imagination to design items representing a host of schools, societies, and other organizations (on more than one occasion I complimented Baron on being able to take his interest in those fairly esoteric subjects and actually make a career out of working with them)
